

Norton, 2000) and Mark Feige for his Irrigated Eden: The Making of an Agricultural Landscape in the American West (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1999).

F.K. WEYERHAEUSER FELLOWSHIP

The F.K. Weyerhaeuser Forest History Fellowship is awarded annually to a student at the FHS university affiliate, Duke University, whose research is historical in nature and related to forestry, land-use, or the environment. The 2002–2003 Fellowship was awarded to Benjamin Poulter, a Ph.D. student in the Nicholas School of the Environment & Earth Sciences, who is studying “Land Use and Climate Change: The History and Trend of a North Carolina Coastal Forest.” Poulter will develop a historical reconstruction that will serve as a baseline from which the response of coastal forests to land-use and sea-level rise will be evaluated. He will examine stand characteristics and physiology in several coastal forest communities on the Albermarle-Pamlico peninsula to determine parameters that identify impacts of sea-level rise. The study will be the first to evaluate such impacts.

ALFRED D. BELL, JR. TRAVEL GRANTS

Alfred D. Bell, Jr. travel grants are awarded to enable researchers to use the FHS library and archives. Recent Bell Fellows include:

Fritz Vandover, Ph.D. candidate in history at Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri, was interested in how the Yale School of Forestry’s presence at several southern lumber companies in the early twentieth century affected the social and racial dynamics of those lumber companies.

James Alsop, professor of history at McMaster University in Hamilton, Ontario studied the impact of mosquito-borne illnesses on the forest products industry of the southern U.S. and Latin America.

Dany Coté, an independent scholar from Québec compared the evolution of sawmill and wood cutting technology in the U.S. and Canada. He was also interested in log driving techniques.

Mary LaBrec, a research assistant in the University of Chicago Law School examined records of lumbermen’s associations for evidence of various types of dispute resolution.
